How Sideline keeps players' videos and photos private

Sideline is a private website for your team. Families watch games and see photos there, and only people your admins approve can get in. Here is exactly how that works.

Approved people only

Every viewer is approved before they see a single video or photo. Nobody gets in by default.

Parents approve relatives

When a grandparent or family friend asks to join, the player's own parent says yes or no.

Video is never public

Game streams are unlisted on YouTube. The link is only given to signed-in, approved viewers, never shown on a public channel or in search.

Photos stay private

Photos are stored privately. Viewing links expire after minutes, so they can't be passed around.

Short names

Players appear as first name and last initial, even to approved families.

Access ends instantly

Remove someone and they're signed out everywhere, right away. Every request is checked.

Auto Player Tagging is optional

An add-on, off unless your club chooses it. When on, an admin reviews every match before families see it.

Your data, your channel

Your YouTube channel stays in your organization's name. Contact-form details are only used to answer you.

Honest about the limits: an approved viewer could still share what they see on their own screen. Sideline keeps games off public channels and controls who gets in; it can't stop a person who's already allowed in from passing something on.
